Historical note

An elected board governs the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. Beginning in 1807 the board, then consisting of twelve members, began selling stock in the corporation to raise money for operating expenses and to pay for the building that had opened to the public in April 1806. Stockholders (also called subscribers) were entitled to one vote per share at the annual meeting, where directors were elected.

Throughout its history, the board has included relatively few artists. The businessmen and attorneys who constituted the board ran the institution without the services of a professional administrator until the 1890s. In the twentieth century, the size of the board grew to more than thirty, but its intimate involvement in the workings of the institution has never waned.

The Pennsylvania Academy was reorganized on a non-stock basis in 1974, and all outstanding shares were canceled. The directors became trustees.
